MUMIA ABU-JAMAL — a journalist and political activist — has been on Pennsylvania's death row for more than 20 years. The worldwide support he has attracted points not only to the power of the anti-death penalty movement, but also — as in the growing number of death row exonerations — to errors and bias in the legal process. Now, after a long pause, Mumia's case is moving again through final federal appeals. In the words of Robert R. Bryan: "Mumia is in extremely grave danger. The authorities want to silence his voice and pen. They thought this could be accomplished by convicting this innocent man and placing him on death row. However, his voice against injustice and oppression is now stronger than ever, and is heard and read throughout the world. The government knows that the only way to stop Mumia is to murder him in the name of the law, to execute him. In over three decades of litigating death-penalty cases, I have not seen one in which the government wants so badly to kill my client. We must not rest until Mumia is free!"
